What's New in the Free Country Flag Icons?

- 9 different sizes - Free Vector or PNG format Adherence to Alzheimer's treatments is a widespread problem, and results in decreased quality of life and dramatic healthcare costs. The average direct cost of Alzheimer's in the US is $83,000. Because there are few treatments available and no cure for Alzheimer's, there is a tremendous demand to develop effective interventions that increase treatment adherence. Recent data suggest that persons with Mild Cognitive Impairment (MCI) frequently forget their medications, resulting in decreased quality of life and increased healthcare costs. We have designed an intervention that combines scheduling, motivational interviewing, and visual cues to teach patients to plan their memory, medication, and other activities. The intervention has been shown to be feasible and acceptable, and results in significant increases in medication adherence, quality of life, and cost-effectiveness. However, no study has yet evaluated its efficacy in persons with MCI, the largest and most prevalent at-risk group. We propose to evaluate the efficacy of such an intervention in persons with MCI who are currently using anti-dementia drugs. We hypothesize that adherence to treatment will be increased, quality of life and healthcare costs will be improved, and cost-effectiveness will be enhanced, as compared to a standard of care (SOC) comparison condition. This study will test the feasibility of using such an intervention in persons with MCI, evaluate its acceptability, and estimate the effect size and optimal sample size for a future efficacy study. After completion, we will determine the target sample size and design a larger trial. The results from this study will have broad applicability, and we plan to adapt our intervention to better suit persons with MCI who are not already using anti-dementia medications.
