each individual component in an automobile is relatively sound proof, the overall vehicle body can be a prime source of noise. Aerodynamic design is often employed to reduce unwanted sound transmission into and out of the vehicle body. Certain techniques used in conventional vehicle design, such as the use of louvers or spats attached to the front and rear of a vehicle body, are known to enhance air flow over certain components, such as the radiator, so that undesirable flow patterns and noise are minimized. While a generally satisfactory solution for noise reduction, the aesthetic appearance of these components may be negatively impacted. In particular, the black louvers or spats may disrupt the outer appearance of the vehicle body thereby detracting from the appearance of the vehicle. In addition, aerodynamic design is known to inherently reduce the efficiency of cooling the vehicle. The present invention provides a vehicle body with a central cavity therein that is adapted to substantially reduce the sound transmission therethrough without impeding the ability of various components on the exterior of the vehicle to achieve desired air flow thereover.
