This study examined the effect of attention and working memory load on event-related synchronization and oscillatory power during cognitive control. We recorded electroencephalogram (EEG) while subjects performed the visual search task, with and without dual-task requirements. EEG was also recorded while subjects performed a Sternberg-type memory task, with and without dual-task requirements. Event-related synchronization (ERS) and oscillatory power were analyzed with source localization. ERS was not affected by attention load during both visual search and memory tasks. In contrast, oscillatory power was lower during visual search with dual-task requirements and during the memory task with dual-task requirements. Our findings indicate that the absence of ERS in the attentional control system may be related to the attention-demanding nature of the task. Moreover, oscillatory power was lower during memory task than during visual search, suggesting that oscillatory power may be related to working memory load.
