Updated to the new CCNP ROUTE R&S 642-902 v3Gamma oscillations and their relation to sensory-motor integration in the human primary motor cortex. Although the role of gamma oscillations in motor learning and function is not completely clear yet, some evidence suggests an association between gamma oscillations and motor performance. In this respect, the previous studies measured these activity features with local field potentials (LFP) with the assumption that this signal is generated by an ensemble of pyramidal cells of interest or reference cells. However, the functional meaning of gamma oscillations in the central nervous system is not always well-understood. Here, we sought to investigate further the role of gamma oscillations in the human primary motor cortex (M1) during movement preparation and execution. We recorded the activity of high-frequency (80-110 Hz) gamma oscillations using electroencephalography (EEG) and examined the association between these activity features and the neural activity recorded at the somatosensory and motor cortices during a hand reaching paradigm. We found that the relative power of gamma oscillations over M1 was associated with the neural activity recorded 0cc13bf012

The Biology of a Prostate Adenocarcinoma Pediatric Case Report. This report describes the clinical case of an 11-year-old patient who had been diagnosed with a prostatic adenocarcinoma. We report his treatment and success in relieving his symptoms. An 11-year-old boy presented with a 6-month history of increasing dysuria, suprapubic pain, bloating, and perineal and rectal bleeding. He was afebrile, hemodynamically stable, and without significant clinical evidence of acute or chronic infection. Laboratory tests revealed a mildly elevated prostate-specific antigen (PSA) level (5 ng/mL). A transrectal ultrasound (TRUS) revealed a heterogeneously hypoechoic right lobe of the prostate, measuring 4.8 × 4.5 × 5 cm (volume 123 cm³). A computed tomography (CT) scan showed a right prostatic tumor, measuring 1.6 × 2.2 cm (volume 0.28 cm³), and right hydroureteronephrosis. He was initially diagnosed with an adenoc
