Lightning in the Dark provides a beautiful lightning display right on your desktop. Thunderstorms are the most dangerous, loudest, and most beautiful phenomena on Earth. On a clear night, lightning almost always flashes, but this is not always the case. The spectacular flashes seen in nature usually occur at night. When the atmosphere is clear and the sun has set, the atmosphere becomes electrified by sunlight, particularly in regions of high pressure. The electrified air between our atmosphere and space gets ionized by the sunlight. This change in the electrical charges in the air causes a movement of electrons from the negative part of the atmosphere to the positive part. The movement of electrons creates a current that moves into the atmosphere as negative charges and leaves the atmosphere as positive charges. When this current of electrons encounters the Earth, it moves into the ground. At the Earth's surface, we are surrounded by an enormous flux of electricity. This current spreads outward from the Earth and is called the ionosphere. Over the continents, lightning is primarily carried by the movement of electrons to the ionosphere. It's because of this electrical current in the ionosphere that the sky looks electrically charged at night. This charge on the sky is generally the result of hot air rising from the Earth reaching the lower parts of the atmosphere. At this altitude, the air temperature and pressure are so low that the electric charges and the movement of electrons become too slow to travel rapidly toward the Earth. The atmosphere at this altitude in the ionosphere is not only electrically charged, but also contains a net charge, because it is a conductor that has a slight negative charge due to the negative side of the atmosphere. The Earth is a conductor, so when the atmosphere in the ionosphere becomes charged with electrons, they move toward the Earth to neutralize the extra charge. This neutralization of the ionosphere causes a ball of electrons to form around the Earth called the ionosphere, or the ionosphere, called a gigantic ball of negatively charged electrons. This is where lightning occurs. The ball of negatively charged electrons causes a local atmosphere, or an ionosphere, to become positively charged. At this point, the air is so positive that it'll arc and break apart into minute electrical charges. When these break apart, they release huge amounts of energy, which is the nature of lightning. When the electrons from the ionosphere can no longer neutralize the positive atmosphere around the Earth, a local thunderstorm is created. As the lightning strikes, it sends an electromagnetic wave into
